ever see a helpful NPC again, especially when they really need one.

I know from experience that players can be broken of annoying and disruptive habits like this with a little creativity. I would just like to say that I do not normally support DMs playing against their players' characters. However, this situation does require it. Good luck, Andrew.

Michael Kellam
Mesquite TX

In responding to Andrew M. Curtis's plea for help in DRAGON #172, I have several ideas that should go a long way toward curing his players of their PCs' yen for killing NPCs simply to get their valuable items. It looks as though they have no fear whatsoever of any kind of retribution for committing (let's call it what it is) murder. Nothing could be further from the truth.

To begin with, paladins would lose their status immediately and irrevocably, and any priest of good alignment would be in instant disfavor with his god. The AD&D® 2nd Edition game's Player's Handbook (page 85) states that "it behooves the priest to maintain himself in good standing with this power, through word and deed." What should a deity's response be when his faithful believer commits (or does nothing to prevent) murder (and murder for material gain, at that)? For starters, the deity should deny all spells to the guilty party; in addition, the sinner should be forced to do penance before being taken back into the fold. This could include anything from making a huge monetary gift to the deceased's family, friends, or loved ones (making the sum beyond the PC's current means of paying, of course) or taking a quest of some kind (such as clearing out the assassins' guild), or even doing both.

Speaking of the assassins' guild (if one doesn't exist in your campaign, perhaps now is the time to introduce one), it would not be idle. First, it might take the blame for deaths in which it had no part; and second, it might begin to fear that someone was taking over its territory. It might not be long before it took some kind of retaliatory action.

By far, the most obvious consequence of doing away with an NPC is that sooner or later someone is going to notice that he's missing. The authorities will eventually be notified and, after sufficient questioning and backtracking, will discover that the deceased was last seen alive in the company of the PCs. (Surprise! It's just what usually happens in real life!) If the PCs have murdered enough NPCs, the law will have amassed sufficient information to not only brand the PCs as "armed and dangerous" but put a price on their heads as well. Encounters with bounty hunters or law-enforcement officials should become more common until the PCs' only safe option might be to flee the kingdom altogether.

If these dire consequences are not enough to deter PCs from murder, even sterner measures can be taken. Who's to say that some of the equipment taken from the dead NPC is not cursed? A ring of delusion, amulet of inescapable location, jewel of attacks, robe of powerlessness, or flask of curses can be particularly damaging, especially if the PCs find themselves battling the assassins' guild.

Finally, if after all of that the PCs still continue to waylay innocent NPCs, don't despair. This is fantasy, right? Who says death has to stop the NPCs from exacting their revenge? The unfortunate victim could return as a ghost, spectre, revenant, or some other undead to wreak havoc on the PCs (it's just a shame that the priests' gods have taken away all their abilities, isn't it?). If ghosts or spectres aren't to your liking, why not afflict the NPC with lycanthropy and really start some sparks?

I hope these ideas might make players think twice next time before their PCs kill off that NPC simply to get his treasure. Let's hear more.

Tony Quirk
San Diego CA

This is a reply to the inquiry Andrew Curtis made about handling players whose PCs kill the NPCs they meet. What Mr. Curtis must do is make his players' PCs afraid to kill these people. There are a few ways that this can be done.

One thing to remember involves monsters and deities. Some monsters enjoy disguising themselves as human beings. What would happen to the PCs when that seemingly easy target turns out to be an ancient gold dragon who doesn't appreciate the social etiquette displayed by the PCs? What if that NPC turns out to be a minion of a deity, or a deity in person? Is there a cleric in your party? Good! Make that NPC a minion of that cleric's deity, and bring on the divine wrath. Make that cleric perform monumental quests to appease the deity, meanwhile not being granted spells by the deity or getting the reverse of what is prayed for.
